Montana Gets Snow

Butte, Mont., April 23.—Butte was under a 14 inch blanket of snow today with the storm which started last night continuing. It is one of the heaviest snowfalls on record here. Traffic in the city has been partially interrupted by the storm. Other parts of the state received heavy rains, which turned to snow at some point.

Study Agricultural Prices

[Government Bulletin]

How much did your grandfather get for eggs? What did he pay for galluses? If you have any old diaries or records or know of any which show prices received by farmers for their products or prices paid for articles purchased by farmers during the hundred years, communicate with Charles F. Sarle of the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Sarle is making a statistical study of prices on all farm products and of things that they buy, to develop index numbers and charts on the long time trend of prices. This historical series of prices will be used in various ways by the department in connection with forecasts of what prices will be in the future.

Records of this character, says Mr Searle, are usually available from files of country newspapers, farm magazines, accounts of mercantile transactions of country merchants; grain and livestock buyers, and private accounts of farm sales and purchases.

New Aircraft Gun

Washington, April 23.—Thru intensive training the navy has not only increased the efficiency of anti-aircraft fire, but is on the threshold of ordnance developments in antiaircraft guns, expected to increase the range, accuracy and effectiveness of such fire.

A new fire inch gun, representing a considerable advance over the present three-inch gun, has reached an advanced point of development and a number will be installed on the battleship Maryland late th summer.

The big snow fall in Montana drove the mercury down quite a bit, even in this latitude. Frost were not at all uncomfortable.

An Open Letter

To the people of Carrizozo and community:

An announcement was made last Sunday at the Methodist Church to the effect that better financial support would have to be given to the pastor or the church would have to close its doors. It is with deep regret that we face this measure of leaving the community without the services of a minister, giving his time to the work of the pastorate in the protestant faith. It is the opinion of the pastor that the community is able to give financial support to the church, and that if each would do his part support would be forthcoming.

The church is not operated for any one person or group of persons; but for the good of the community at large. We are open to preach the gospel as we are able to interpret it from the Bible; to visit the sick and distressed, to marry the living and bury the dead. The pastor is interested and will do all he can to promote any cause that will be for the benefit of the community. But while he is thus engaged he must have sufficient support to be able to pay his honest debts and have at least some of the necessities of life. The church is trying to pay $1,000 a year, and during the last seven months has only been able to pay about $300. This salary, if paid, would be about one-half of what the government computes as the subsistence level.

The people of the community have always supported the minister, and it is our opinion that they do not desire to see the church close; so we are not giving a report of the actual conditions which obtain. It is not at all necessary to mention the fact that the church is an asset to a community, and that money contributed to its support will certainly return dollar for dollar to the town and the business of the town. Business men all know that, divesting themselves of any sentiment they may have one way or the other, prosperity does not come to a community where the higher values are not maintained; nor do people come into a community where their efforts are not being made to create a moral atmosphere in which they may rear their children.

The officials of the church are: R. M. Brickley, O. T. McQuillen, S. W. Wells, Mrs. L. A. McCall, Mrs. Clara Snow and Mrs. Robt Doane. They plan to give the people of the town and community an opportunity to contribute to the church, and they will gladly receive any help which may be given.

W. R. McPherson,
Pastor.

Oil Boom at Hand

(Silver City Independent)

New Mexico in the past four years suffered a shrinkage of upwards of $100,000,000 in taxable property, principally through losses sustained in the livestock industry due to low prices and drouth.

This is a serious situation and a tremendous loss for state, the assessed valuation of which is only a little over $300,000,000.

The problem ahead is how to make up for these losses, and we believe the answer will be found in the development of the oil fields in the northwestern, southeastern and southwestern parts of the state, and the discovery of new fields.

That New Mexico is on the eve of a genuine oil boom, that will equal, if not exceed, the Texas, California and Wyoming fields, within the next two or three years, is the opinion of geologists.

Such a boom would add hundreds of dollars to New Mexico's assessed valuation, in a comparatively short space of time.

Change in the Roswell Mail Line Schedule

The Carrizozo-Roswell mail line schedule changed its schedule of departure from this point this week from 8:00 a.m. to 7:30 a.m. The reason assigned for the change is that the Pecos Valley lines of the Santa Fe have changed their schedules, and the earlier departure of the mail from Carrizozo is made to coincide with mail changes at the other end.

SYNOPSIS.—Lee Anderson, Royal Canadian Mounted Police sergeant, is sent to Stony Range to arrest a man named Pelly for murder. He is also instructed to look after Jim Rathway, reputed head of the "Free Traders," illicit liquor runners. At Little Falls he finds Pelly is credited with having found a gold mine, and is missing. At the hotel appears a girl, obviously out of place in the rough surroundings. A half-breed, Pierre, and a companion, "Shorty," annoy the girl. Anderson interferes in her behalf. The girl sets out for Sinton Lake, which is also Anderson's objective. He overtakes her and the two men with whom he had trouble the night before. She is suspicious of him and the two men are hostile. Pierre and Shorty ride on. Anderson and the girl following. In the hills the road is blown up, before and behind the two. Anderson, with his horse, is hurled down the mountain side, senseless. Recovering consciousness, Anderson finds the girl has disappeared, but he concludes she is alive and probably in the power of Pierre and Shorty. On foot he makes his way to Sinton Lake. There he finds his companion of the day before, and Rathway, with a girl, Estelle, a former sweetheart of Anderson's, who had abused his confidence and almost wrecked his life. Rathway strikes Estelle, and after a fight Anderson, with Estelle's help, escapes with the girl. Anderson's companion's mind is clouded and she is suffering with a dislocated knee. Anderson sets the knee and makes the girl as comfortable as possible. He has a broken rib.

"Where am I? What has happened?" she asked.

Lee saw at once that she had no remembrance of anything that had occurred since the catastrophe, and probably it would be some time before the memory of that came back to her. He must protect her against the shock of the realization until she was able to bear it.

"Your horse threw you," he answered. "You hurt your knee and cut your head. You will have to keep still for awhile, and we shall have to remain here for a few days. Are you in much pain?"

"My head aches, and my knee—yes, it does hurt a little. It isn't broken, is it?"

"It was dislocated. I had to set it."

"Oh!" A faint color crept into her cheeks. "There was a little alone. Are you a doctor, then?"

"No. I was just a humble orderly and stretcher bearer on the western front," Lee answered. "But you see, it had to be attended to, and so I—well, I did it. After you've drunk some tea I'm going to be an orderly again and rebandage your head."

"Don't cut my hair—my hair! You cut my hair off!" she exclaimed, putting her hands up to her head. "Was that necessary?"

"You were caught by the hair under your horse and there was danger that it might roll on you at any moment," Lee prevaricated.

She passed her hand again feel the jagged locks about her ears, and looked at him with eyes in which a little relief appeared.

"Thank you, Mr. Doctor," she said. "I'm so glad you take it in that way. I was afraid you might find it difficult to forgive me."

"I might only—well, you see, I've been thinking of having it bobbed for some time, only I never got around to it. I don't think you made a very clean job of it, did you?"

They laughed, but she was weak, and after she had drunk the tea Lee made for her, she fell asleep until the middle of the afternoon, by which time Lee had completed the shelter over her.

"Better?" he asked, when she awoke.

She nodded. "I don't look nearly as untidy now," she said. "And I'm not so much pain. But will I have to lie here on my back for days?"

"As a matter of fact, the sooner you try to walk the better. I'm going to cut a serviceable crutch for you, and you'll be able to hobble about the camp just as soon as you feel inclined to."

"But you're not hurt, are you?" asked the girl. "Your left arm seems stiff."

"I hurt my side a little, but it'll be all right in a few days," Lee answered.

She wrinkled her forehead. "Do you know," she said, "I don't quite remember falling. I was riding, you say? Were we both riding? Then where are our horses?"

"They were badly hurt," said Lee. "It became necessary to put them out of their suffering."

The girl was trying hard to remember. "A bad fall, then? How did it happen? A bad fall in this forest?"

"A little distance back. I carried you here. We fell down a rocky slope."

"Oh!" She remained silent a little, evidently trying to remember. Then she smiled.

"You have been wonderfully good to me. You know I trusted you the minute I saw you, and I wasn't the least bit frightened, waking up and finding myself alone here in the forest with you."

"I hope you will be able to bear the waiting here," said Lee. "We'll go on just as soon as it's possible."

"But I'm not really in any hurry," the girl answered. "It was odd how reconciled she seemed to be now, and how the future had ceased to trouble her. "It's so glorious to be in the woods again, and at this time of the year above everything. It's such a long time since I was in the woods before. I've been living in a big city, you know—nothing but blocks of houses and asphalt and stone. I felt like a prisoner there."

And Lee wondered again at her acquiescence in this new turn of fate.

"Now—may I wash that out in your head and tie it for you?"

"Yes, doctor," she smiled at him.

He boiled the bandage, washed the cut in boiled water, and retied the strip of cotton about it. The girl was still too weak to talk very much. But it was the most wonderful thing that had ever happened to him, sitting there with her in that intimate companionship, forgetting that she had been at odds with him, putting aside all the memories of conflict, forgetting, too, that she was a woman, seeing in her only a comrade.

After awhile Lee made some cakes in the ashes of the fire, and cooked some bacon. The girl was able to eat a little, and he felt his appetite returning. Undoubtedly he had gone through the worst of it. Again they sat in silence, till the girl said:

"Do you know, I have forgotten your name?"

He had not told her, but he said, "Lee Anderson."

Anderson was a common enough name in the district, and would convey nothing to her.

And as she seemed still to be fretting or puzzling, Lee laid his hand on hers and said:

"You mustn't worry. We shall go on just as soon as it's possible to."

"That's just what I've been wondering about," she answered. "It's very silly of me, but—where is it that we are going?"

And as Lee looked at her in astonishment, she went on:

"It's curious, you know, Mr. Anderson, but I don't seem exactly to remember where we met, either, or why I left that place—where was it? That big city whose name slipped my memory for the moment. Nor why we came to the woods—you know, in the woods, you know," she corrected.

"And then, who am I? I had my name on the tip of my tongue a moment ago, and I'll know soon, I suppose, but it's—just now it all seems to be confused somehow." And then Lee realized that her memory of the past was completely obliterated.

CHAPTER VIII

While Memory Slept

No, the girl had not completely forgotten, for it was not exactly a blank to her. She had a vague recollection of a number of things, but everything appeared to be shadowy and confused, and when she tried to piece it together, the fragments slipped out of her grasp.

It was in names and places that the hope chiefly occurred, harassing her ever heavily, and it was this fact that gave Lee cause for meditation.

She had lived in the forests in childhood, she seemed to recall a visit to them of recent years; at any rate, she had all the woodcraft of one to whom the forest was home. She had been educated in a convent, she thought, and had been living for several years in a large city, studying.

She thought she had been studying to be a medical missionary among the Indians.

Thus she was not cut off from that association of habits, tastes, and experiences that goes to make the personality; she did not feel that she had lost very much, and it was always as if she were upon the point of remembering everything.

Out of this vague, blurred dream she had awakened to find herself in the woods with Lee, with the knowledge of how or why she had come there.

It might have been the concussion from the fall, but Lee, after pondering over the case, decided that it was much more like a case of shell-shock, and that the injury to her head had been only a contributing cause.

He made her a crutch next morning and by the afternoon she felt well enough to hobble a few steps about the camp. The accident which had temporarily impaired her memory, seemed to have wrought a strange change in her nature. She was no longer wildly anxious to push on to her destination; she accepted Lee as a fact in her life, and showed how completely she trusted him, despite the intimacy in which they were both living.

He was sure that her memory would suddenly come back to her completely. And, memory did come back in dreams, as with shell-shocked patients, but only to vanish with the waking.

At night Lee, lying near her beneath another rough shelter of boughs that he had made for himself, would hear her tossing and moaning, and occasionally uttering fragments of unintelligible sentences.

Day merged into day. Lee's rib was healing well, and the girl was beginning to set her foot to the ground. At first she was dependent upon him in nearly everything. He helped her to take her first steps without the crutch, leaning upon his shoulder. They were always together.

It was so wonderful a companionship. It was that comradeship of which Lee had always dreamed. And it was the more wonderful, perhaps, because the girl's severance from the past gave it a sort of unreality, as if it were a little piece of paradise which they had snatched for themselves out of the sum total of human happiness.

Soon she began to assume charge of the camp and the cooking. And Lee, lying at her feet, listening while she talked, or lying awake at night beneath his shelter, in the dread of hearing her moan, came at last to realize that his feeling for her was becoming something more than the mere enjoyment of her companionship.

He loved her, he sometimes admitted to himself; and when a word or glance of his would send the blood mantling into her cheek, he dared to think that his love was returned. And now he cared no longer whether her memory of the past ever came back to her. Almost better to let her live in ignorance of all that had distressed her.

He began to dread the inevitable day when remembrance would come to blot out their paradise. Only a little incident would be needed, some little shock that would knit the ravelled ends of memory, and then—

Then what would lie before them?

Another thing to be apprehended was the day, so near now, when they must leave their woodland paradise. Autumn had returned wonderfully, but there was a sharper tang in the air each morning, everything was dead and lay formed every night upon the pool beneath their little spring.

And it seemed now as if Lee's search for Pelly would have to be postponed—though the winter months if he inquiries at the mission proved fruitless, it would mean returning to Little Falls for a sleigh and dogs.

Then there was the matter of the Free Traders.

Lee would find his hands full soon enough.

"Do you know, Lee," said the girl one day, "I often feel as if I were on the very verge of remembering. And when I wake in the morning, just for an instant I feel a strange pulse, as if I had remembered. And I am afraid of remembering. It is as if remembrance would bring back something terrible with it. Who am I?"

"You are just you," said Lee, smiling. "That's enough for me."

"Where did we meet?"

"In the range."

"I was alone? And then I had an accident and was thrown from my horse? And you, too? It is so strange. I know that I lived in a large city not long ago, and that I was so glad to get back to the woods. But where was I living? That's the big problem that we have to solve, isn't it?" She looked at him earnestly. "Lee," she said solemnly, "sometimes I hope I never shall remember."

She made no plans, leaving everything to Lee, and nothing was decided. By the middle of the second week she could walk fairly well, her strength had come back, and the little period of elysian was drawing to its end. It was inevitable that the problem should be faced.

For the first time she had accompanied Lee as far as the lake shore. There had been no signs of the Free Traders, and Lee was convinced that they had long since abandoned all hope of finding them. It was a wonderful evening. There was a haze of Indian summer in the November air, there was still a touch of fire in the leaves of birch and maple; the west was radiant with the sunset clouds.

And, standing there beside her, Lee knew at last—knew for sure that this love was eternal, and the former love only the pale shadow that it had cast before it. He turned toward her and read the same knowledge in her eyes.

"Dear—" he said.

He took her in his arms, and she lay there, confident, happy in the knowledge that she was his. She put her arms about his neck and their lips met. And they looked at each other in all the thrill and glory and surprise of it. It was all so simple, so incredibly dear and true.

"You, woman of mine, without a name, who have come to me out of nowhere because I wanted you! How long have you known?"

"I've known almost since the beginning that if you cared as much as I do, Lee, you must love me more than I thought it possible to love."

He looked at her incredulously, and between them the pale wraith of Estelle floated for just a moment. He had trusted her. He had vowed never to trust again in any woman.

Then it was dissipated in the sunshine of their love. "Do you care enough to trust yourself to me and take the chance of what the future may bring to us?"

"I love you enough to trust you altogether, Lee," she answered.

But there was just the shadow of a little fear in her eyes. "Oh, my dear, I am afraid, awfully afraid of the time when—when I remember. Do you know that since I knew I loved you, and thought you cared for me, I have sometimes prayed that I may never remember? I have been afraid of what may be lying in wait for us, waiting to overwhelm us, as if it grudged our happiness."

"You must not let yourself grow morbid." But Lee, too, felt the wings of that shadow of fear beat past him. "There is nobody else?" he asked. "We shall not find that we have been tricked like that? It would be unbearable."

"No, no! I'm sure of that, Lee; surer than that I stand here, that I have never loved anybody else. I know that so well, Lee; for if there had been, I should have felt it by instinct, however deep down within me the memory of him lay buried. No, love isn't like that; it doesn't lose itself like that. There is nobody but you—never anybody but you.

"But what I'm afraid of is that something else, something terrible may come between us—"

"There's nothing else that could separate us."

"If you were engaged?" Lee would no sooner have deliberately stolen another man's sweetheart than his wife. To him love was a thing of eternity. It was either a very young man's view or a very idealistic one's; yet there are men of mature minds who hold that doctrine; that was why the affair of Estelle had broken his life.

"Suppose I had become engaged to someone I didn't love, Lee?"

"You couldn't. You don't think"—she felt thrilled by the consternation in his voice—"that you—you have, dearest?"

"No, I—I'm sure I haven't. But," she persisted, "I just felt curious to know what we would do, in case."

"Oh, then—why, I suppose we'd have to go to him and tell him that we loved each other, and then, of course, he would release you," answered Lee, looking troubled. "But, we don't have to think of that possibility, dear, do we?"

"Of course not, Lee," she answered.

But again he saw that she had her brows in perplexity, and he knew that she was thinking, thinking, trying to locate those rebellious strands of memory.

"You don't live in the range, Lee, do you?" asked the girl presently.

"No, I live at Mistaken. That's a long distance away. I've just come here on business."

"Won't you tell me what your business is?"

Lee hesitated. "Well, it's secret in a way, though I'm not under any pledge." It's instinct was to tell her, and yet the thinking of eight years seemed to seal his lips against her. "You see, I'm acting for others."

"Why, then of course I wouldn't ask you to tell me, Lee," she answered. "Only I have a curious sort of feeling that your business may be bound up with me in some way, that perhaps it means your going into danger."

"I don't think there's much danger attached to it."

But she caught that "much" with alarm. "A little danger, Lee? You know, I couldn't bear you being exposed to danger. But—what is there beyond the range? You see, I've been talking to you about the range ever since I first heard you speak of it, and yet I don't really know where we are. It's curious, too, because for the first week after my illness, I didn't seem to care. Is there a city beyond the range?"

"No, thank God, all the cities lie behind us. Nothing but forest."

"But are you going to see someone, meet someone?"

"There's a Moravian mission three or four days' journey away."

"Oh, are you going there?" She was still unsatisfied, still looking at him in that wistful way.

"Yes, I am going to take you there, dear, and leave you in the care of Father McGrath, who is in charge of it, while I am away. He will take good care of you. He is a fine man, and well known for his work among the Indians. When the old priest died last winter, Father McGrath was sent for, all the way from Labrador to take his place.

"I think," he added, "that we shall be able to start in three or four days now. We want to be off before the weather changes."

"How long will you be away, Lee?"

"Perhaps a week—or longer."

And he wondered, as he spoke, whether it would be a week—or a whole winter.

He held her hands and looked into her eyes. "Have you faith enough in me to be willing to wait quietly there even if—if I should be gone for more than a week?" he asked.

"Till you return, no matter how long, Lee," she answered simply.

"Even if you remembered? No matter what you remember?"

"Even if I should remember. But, Lee"—the note of fear came into her voice again—"when the time comes that I remember, I want you with me. I am so oppressed sometimes—when I awake in the morning, always. I seem to have been traveling in my dreams all night in horrible places, among hateful people. I seem to have some terrible duty laid upon me, something that I must carry out, although it kills me. And then—I awake to you.

"But one thing I know beyond everything in the world, and that is that there could never have been anyone but you, Lee, dearest; never in the whole world. So take me, Lee, and shield me with your love, and be all in this world to me, for I shall never love anyone but you."

"I'll take you to the mission, dear, and when I come back, I shall take you south with me, and you shall forget all your fears," answered Lee.

So they put their troubles aside, and all the uncertainties of the future, and were sublimely happy in their love. Yet, happy as he was, Lee realized that it would be well for them when he had placed her in the care of Father McGrath at the mission. Only then would the load of anxiety be removed from him.

CHAPTER IX

Joyce Comes Home

In the middle of the night a wild storm sprang up, bringing with it a driving snow. Its violence blew down their two shelters almost simultaneously, involving them in a debris of boughs and branches.

They made light of their troubles. Lee succeeded in getting some sort of protection up, and the remainder of that night they crouched beneath it, happy, in spite of the snow that piled up all about them.

When morning came, they looked out on a white world. It was freezing hard, and the spring had dwindled to a thread in a basin of ice.

Lee very quickly had a fire burning and tea ready. But it looked as if winter had come to stay. They had had a rude awakening from their paradise. It seemed essential to push on as soon as possible.

In fact, without showshoes they were likely to find themselves seriously inconvenienced in the event of a heavy fall. Lee meant to prosecute his inquiries at the mission, and, in case nothing came of these, to go to Little Falls and on, and then return.

"I'm sure I'm well enough to start today, Lee," said the girl that morning, as they discussed the situation. "We could start off slowly, you see, and then if it did snow heavily, it would be much more of a check on me later on, without snowshoes, than now, when the traveling is easy, wouldn't it? So we ought to try to get to the mission within a day or two."

Lee agreed, and they decided to push on slowly that day by the trail beside the lake. The mission was near the head of the lake, about two days' journey away.

Most of the contents of the pack were left behind. Lee had to travel as light as possible; but fortunately, the sled was fairly set, and the light baggage which he were around it eliminated serious danger of its breaking apart.

When they stopped for the noon meal they had several miles to their credit. The girl's knee had given her no trouble, and both were jubilant.

That day they covered a good fifteen miles—almost a short day's journey. When they camped, the girl said:

"Do you know, Lee, I am almost certain that I have passed this way before. It all looks somehow familiar to me, and yet somehow as if I'd seen it in a dream. You remember that big rock we passed in the middle of the stream? Well, I had a feeling all the time that we should come to it as we rounded the bend."

"And you have no idea whether you ever lived in this region or not?" he asked.

"No, dear. I'm inclined to think, though, that I may have done so. Perhaps I was at school at that very mission you spoke of. If I was, someone there will be sure to recognize me. I've got a feeling that I was studying in some big city—Montreal, or Winnipeg, perhaps, to take up medical mission work here."

Well, it's a case of true love, all right. But when the girl remembers who she is and learns Anderson's mission—then what?

POOR BELLA DOLL

BELLA DOLL was quite old, but she did not know this, for there was no one to tell her. She had been thought very beautiful when she was first given to the little girl who had grown up long ago, but Bella Doll had been carefully wrapped and put in a drawer in the attic.

One day Bella was delighted to be taken out of the drawer and given to another little girl to play with. "She was my best doll," said the grown-up lady to the little girl. "Her face is made of wax, so you must be very careful, because she will break easily."

Bella was very happy for a while with her new mother. She was taken out for a ride every day in a handsome carriage and her clothes were taken off at night. She had new ones, too, and Bella was put in a pretty doll's bed all white and soft.

"Oh, Look, She Has Cried All Over Her Face!"

Her eyes opened and closed and the little girl had never had a doll that could be made to sleep. So for a while Bella was well cared for.

But one night Bella found herself in her carriage and the big clock struck off the hours, but no one came for her.

"I'll freeze and crack," thought Bella Doll. "I never was treated so before."

Early in the morning a big dog came along and kissed her, but Bella didn't know it was a kiss. She was sure the dog meant to eat her and she wished herself safe again in the drawer in the attic.

But all this was nothing to what happened later, for you see the carriage was on the sunny side of the porch and pretty soon the sun began to shine right on Bella Doll.

She wasn't cold now, but she was far more uncomfortable, for her face began to melt and when by and by the new little mother thought about Bella Doll: "I never forgot you; I cry which brought the grown-up lady out of the house to find out what had happened.

"Oh, look, she has cried all over her face!" said the little girl, beginning to cry herself.

"I told you not to leave her in the sun," said the grown-up lady. "Poor Bella Doll! I never forgot you; I never left you out all night. Little girls do not love their dolls as I did when I was a little girl."

"Can't we have her face made over?" said the little girl.

"No; she is past repairing," said the grown-up lady, with a sigh. "But I can't put you in the rag bag, Bella Doll. I loved you too much when I was a little girl to throw you away now. Even if your face is spoiled you are still Bella Doll and you shall go back to the attic and spend the rest of your days where the sun will not melt you, and you will not be left out all night to shiver."

"Did it hurt her much, mother, do you think?" asked the little girl.

"How do you think you would have felt if I had left you out on the porch all night?" was the answer.

"I would have cried and been scared, I guess," said the little girl.

"Perhaps Bella was," said her mother, as she carried Bella up the attic stairs and put her away again in the drawer.

"Well, I am glad to be back," said Bella to a china dog and cat that were in the drawer. "It isn't the same world we knew about when we were played with by the careful little girl to whom we belonged. Little mothers do not love you today as they did when I was a new doll."

"Then I shall never wish again to be taken out of this drawer," said China Dog.

"No; don't," said Bella. "You will be sorry if you get your wish."

Mary

Popular Mary Pickford, the star of stars of the "movies," was born in Toronto, Canada. At the age of five she made her first appearance on the professional stage in a stock company at Toronto. Within a short time she was induced to become a "movie" actress. The splendid acting and clean, wholesome stories presented by Miss Pickford have done much to make motion pictures the popular form of entertainment.

The Why of Superstitions

By H. IRVING KING

EARRINGS FOR WEAK EYES

TO CURE sore eyes or strengthen weak eyes wear a little, round, gold earring in the pierced lobe of the ear. Up to within a comparatively recent date this superstition was universal in the United States. It still exists in some parts of the country and especially holds its own among sailors of the old school. As women, with intervals of abstention decreed by fashion, are accustomed to wear earrings for the sake of ornamentation, it is to men that the superstition principally applies as a curative process.

This superstition had its origin in the strong belief of the ancients in the power of the senses to convey actual, tangible effects to the body. The superstition of the evil eye is an example of what it was believed the power of sight could do and there was, also, a belief in the power of conveyance resident in the sense of hearing. Many myths show that the ear was regarded as a portal through which might enter the vital principle conveyed by the sense of hearing.

The crocodile cult of Egypt is a notable example. The crocodile was worshiped as a sun-god at Sebek and from most ancient times its image has been regarded as a charm against the evil eye. As the sense of sight, through the evil eye, was the spiritual conveyer of mortal ills, so the sense of hearing was, in general, regarded as the conveyer of beneficent and vitalizing influences. Sore eyes and weak eyes were regarded as the result of a glance from the evil eye. Herodotus writing in the Fourth century especially mentions this belief. Now if, through the eye came evil, through the ear might come good to counteract it. Therefore was attached to the ear as a votive offering to the beneficent spirit of life the mystic symbol of the sun, concerning the mystery of which volumes have been written. Taking into consideration the cult of the crocodile it would appear that the little gold rings inserted into the lobe of the ear for curative purposes were originally intended to represent the sun.

LOLA

ABOUT the time that Carmen and Juanita came into vogue in this country the Spanish favorite Lola was also introduced. Somehow it seems less foreign than the other two members of the trio and it has had more widespread usage. Though the most feminine of names and generally associated with the Spanish coquette idea, with flashing black eyes and slender ankles and the click of the castanets, the name signifies "man."

It is rather curious that a Spanish name should originate in Germany, yet such is the case in this instance. Lola's earliest ancestor was the great Carlo Magno of romance and ballad. But the evolution of the name into Lola is really no more curious than the manner in which the Teutonic figure here received his title. According to the story, he was put out to nurse as an infant and when brought home much grown, his mother exclaimed, "What great carl is this?" Thus he came to be called Karl instead of David, which was his baptismal name.

After the wave of Karls and Charles had overspread Europe, Carlota made her appearance in Spain. Carlotta of Savoy, who married Louis XI of France, rendered the name famous. It was used by all manner of maids throughout Spain and when it was contracted, Lola was considered more euphonious and more Latin than Lota.

The moonstone is Lola's talismanic gem. It is said to bring her the love she desires and it is particularly efficacious in securing admiration for her. Monday is her lucky day and two her lucky number.

No "K" in Latin

There was a letter K in the original Latin language, and it appears in the earliest Latin inscriptions. It was later dropped from the alphabet and replaced by C. The K does not appear in classical Latin except in the abbreviations for Kalendae and for the proper name Kaeso.

A BESETTING SIN

"I AM sure in my own mind that Mr. Grigglngs is drinking," remarked the landlady in the tone of one who views with alarm. "A man doesn't have such a red hose unless he is consuming intoxicating liquors."

"I have cautioned you many times, Mrs. Jiggers, against jumping to conclusions, which is your besetting sin," said the star boarder. "Many reputations have been ruined by such remarks as yours. Any physician will tell you it is possible to have a crimson beak and still be a teetotaler. I am not on intimate terms with Mr. Griggins, although I call at his store now and then to purchase some of his cigars, which are made of cabbage. He sells the worst smokes in this town, and should be rebuked for that, but I'd never suspect him of being an inebriate.

"He might become one if it happened to rain gin some night, and he had a barrel under the rainspout, but as long as it costs money there isn't much danger of Mr. Griggins going astray. He is the most passionately economical man I ever saw. His regard for a penny is abnormal. A week or two ago I bought a cigar at his cement counter, and was short one cent when I paid for it. I told him I'd pay the cent the next time I dropped in, and I fully intended to, but I forgot to drop in for several days. During that period, Mrs. Jiggers, I met him on the street several times, and he asked me for that cent, with tears in his eyes, at every encounter. A man of that character won't waste any money in riotous living. You may paste that in your Sunday bonnet, my dear Mrs. Jiggers, for your guidance when you are trying to size up the [illegible] of your friends and acquaintances.

"So let us be on our guard against such mental infirmities, Mrs. Jiggers, and meanwhile I would suggest that you replenish the maple syrup pitcher. These pancakes are too dry and dusty to eat without a lubricant."

Pain In Back & Sides

"FOR A LONG TIME," says Mrs. Dora Payne, of Huntington, Tenn., "I felt listless, tired and worn-out. I did not feel like doing my work, visiting or anything.

"I suffered much pain in my back and sides. My limbs hurt, my knees would tremble without apparent cause and I would have to sit down.

"I was very nervous. . . I would have a tired, dull headache.

"I had read so much about Cardui I asked my husband to get it for me. The very first bottle seemed to help me. After the second . . . I was better than I had been in months; I certainly can praise Cardui.

"I have taken three bottles. Now I hardly wait, when the sun shines, to garden. I am feeling fine."

Similar results to those described above have been reported by thousands of other women. Cardui's 40 years of success should encourage you to give it a thorough trial for the relief of any common female ailments.

FRIDAY, APRIL 24 1925

Advertising is not truthful at all times, as critics point out, but it must also be remembered that some of the most skilful liars never indulge in the advertising art.

The man who does is the man who succeeds. Half a dozen other men may be thinking about the same thing, but the doer has succeeded while the thinkers continue to think.

The Otero machine seems to be in bad condition. A tire is punctured, the body rattles and the engine gives only an occasional burst, puff that sounds like a wheeze from Al.

Those election bets had better be paid soon—if Republicans expect their word to be of any value in the future. The suspicion is growing, however, that their magnitude furnishes the main inspiration for the contest.

Criticism has been leveled at low neck gowns and short skirts ever since woman donned them, but the woman who is justified in the exposition knows too well the favorable impression she creates on Adam's side of the house when she presents such a chic appearance, for any thought of a return to the conventional dress of olden days. The latest vogue is not only attractive to the sons of Adam, but is a distinct relief to Dad—to [illegible] change.

Eighth Grade Pupils Have an Outing

At five o'clock Saturday morning, pupils of the eighth grade, Carrizozo school, assembled at the home of their teacher, Mrs M. L. Blaney. In a little time thereafter six automobiles and a commodious truck started for the Indian Picture Rocks, six miles distant. Mrs. Blaney, assisted by Mesdames Kelley, English, McCammon, Lemon, Saunders, Miss Brickey and Messrs Lemon and Blaney, prepared a breakfast consisting of hot biscuits, bacon, eggs, cookies, cake and coffee for the lively girls and boys. After breakfast, exploring parties started in various directions to see what might be found. An interesting and enjoyable time was had by all. They returned in the late afternoon, a little tired but happy.

Expert Advice on How to Compose Love Poem

First of all, to compose a love poem, it is necessary to know a few facts about the girl. Don't be alarmed—nothing intimate or risque is necessary. Color of eyes—hair—shape of mouth and general appearance are good facts to observe. The condition of teeth is another good point. However, it is not considered good form to pry open the mouth for a detailed inspection. The feet are another good point—if small—and the distance between the ankle and knee—only, however, if voluntarily exposed.

Next is to think of all the words that rhyme with "love." Incidentally don't forget that "you" and "true" are perfect rhymes. If you want to do the thing right it is better to borrow—or if you can't borrow, to buy, a rhyming dictionary which will give you words rhyming with "them," "evermore," "sweet," "passion" and others.

Write the poem with due precautions on the delicate questions of complexion and possible changes of color of hair. Pay some (but not too much) attention to neither extremities, as previously mentioned.

Revise the poem. Rewrite it. Copy it.

Stand up and read it aloud, with appropriate gestures, before your mirror.

Finish.

Tear it twice, once lengthwise and once across, and deposit the whole in a safe place.—From the Jester.

Water Is Literally Their Staff of Life

The most amazing race of human beings is undoubtedly the El Molo, a tribe of "fishermen," who inhabit the desert wastes bordering Lake Rudolf, in Kenya colony, Africa. This tribe represents the only known specimens of [illegible] and it is a curious fact that any tribesman dies if he is kept without water for about three hours. As a rule they drink every hour during the day, for even an hour and a half without water causes cracking and bleeding of the lips, the Boston Transcript says.

The El Molo tribesmen spend their days swimming in the waters of Lake Rudolf and fishing from frail rafts constructed with palm branches. Fish is almost their only diet and they have no opportunity of varying their menu, unless they are fortunate enough to spear a hippopotamus. The water of Lake Rudolf is undrinkable to anyone but the El Molo, for it contains a large quantity of soda and has an objectionable taste. The proportion of soda in that lake increases yearly, and it is believed to be this fact that has caused the "fishermen" to become a deformed race.

Man-Made World

"If I believed in change I should sketch a world where women would live upon shelves, shelves without ladders. One would take them down when one wanted them; they would be delighted to be taken down, dropping their little hands, cooing like babies, and yet understand one's deepest thoughts. One would also take them down in the morning to do the housework; at other times one would live sternly and bravely with other men as stern and brave, until one came to need again the women who would be akin to those very expensive dolls who say 'Papa' and 'Mamma' when you press a spring. When one got tired of their repertory one would send them to the shop to have a different repertory put in."—W. L. George in "The Triumph of Gallio."

Stanton Defeats Indians

Last Sunday's ball game at Fort Stanton resulted in an easy victory for the Stanton team, which had for opponents an Indian team from the Mescalero Reservation. In the eighth inning the tribe protested a decision by the umpire, contending that a long fly by a Fort Stanton batter was a foul, which the umpire had called fair, and on which the batter made a home run. After considerable chattering the Indians walked off the diamond, thus forfeiting the game. The Stantons had, however, run up a score 9, while the visitors were credited with only 3, and had the game gone the full nine innings the discrepancy would have been still greater. The Indians were so badly outclassed that they were overwhelmed without any effort by the Fort team. A large crowd was in attendance, many different communities of the county furnishing a quota.

Are to Wear Long and Short Sleeves

Individuality is the keynote of the new Chanel collection which nevertheless interprets all of the novel springtime themes, notes a Paris fashion writer in the New York Herald-Tribune. Every model that is designed by Chanel bears the hallmark of distinction. She ignores rumors of possible tendencies and quietly continues making gowns on her own characteristic lines, and these are invariably among the most sought after on the continent. Whether she makes a simple sports suit with straight workmanlike breeches under the neat wrap-over skirt, or a georgette crepe coat for afternoon wear that is covered with an elaborate embroidery of tiny steel beads, Chanel always gives that indescribable chic to every model that is typical of her house. Beauty is the leitmotif of the whole collection, yet the models are always practical.

Robes du soir are either elaborate or quite simple. Some are developed in metal lame with heavy incrustations of rich metal lace, while others are of simplest georgette or chiffon, depending merely on the charm of their cut, beauty of coloring and the simple grace of various little scarves, tied shoulder straps and floating draperies. Lace is very much used for evening gowns in black, beige, green and in other colors, and it plays a considerable part in this section of the collection. Pearl and bead fringes are used, strings six to eight inches in length swaying spirally round a tunic and shorter ones covering a skirt in close serried rows.

The jumper dress occupies its usual pre-eminent place. Chanel uses shades of blue crepella and crepe de chine to carry it out with an effect of chic simplicity. Perhaps the most delightful jumper suit in the whole collection is made in bois de rose waterproof crepe de chine with steel runners fastening the pockets and a revers decolletage which is at the side instead of the center front.

Abandons Sleeveless Gown.

Like other houses, Chanel has abandoned the sleeveless gown for daytime this season. Instead this shows short sleeves some five or six inches long, some of them finished with handkerchief ties, some of them plain. Full-length sleeves outnumber all other types and they are generally fitted, although some of them widen just the tiniest bit toward the wrist.

Attractive tailored suits also play an important part in the collection. Black and white checked [illegible] is used for one of these which has a white pique waistcoat that fastens down the side. Another model is in easy [illegible] with narrow tax plaits to [illegible] panels at the back and front of both coat and skirt. A white blouse accompanies this model. A brown fancy check tweed suit has two-tone borders of two shades of darker brown at the hem of both coat and skirt. With it is worn a plain sweater of natural jersey cloth bound with the tweed at the neck and buttoning down a short slit at one side.

Tweed, [illegible] and jersey are Chanel's favorite materials for golfing suits. She makes them with practical wrap-over skirts or with a few inverted plaits at the sides, and approximates the slim silhouette although at the same time giving plenty of room for movement. This season she is again using the short scarves that are such a striking finish to the jumper and skirt costume that is worn for golf or country wear.

Crepella is the material which forms the basis of the collection. In black it is fashioned into simple little street frocks which have a circular movement to the apron front of the skirt. Correct rows of buttons here and there, and occasionally a shoulder cape. Although she uses a great deal of foulard, Chanel is fully awake to the practical and becoming qualities of the Chinese tub silk that is so much used for men's shirts.

Black and White Used.

Black-and-white effects are noteworthy. Once more Chanel makes straight sack jackets to match printed gowns. She also has a black-and-white sack coat to wear with a plain black georgette crepe gown adorned with much fine plaiting. Red is as great a favorite with Chanel as it was last season. She shows an amusing red foulard gown with black spots dotted about it at irregular intervals, while the corsage is divided by narrow horizontal bands of piping some three inches apart.

Chanel shows her usual genius for coats, though she is making capes as well, both for day and evening wear, especially the short shoulder variety for daytime. The coats fit slightly at the waist and flare just a little to the skirt. Wide bands of dyed feathers trim the evening wraps this year. Chanel still uses some of the shirred gathering that she made so popular nearly a year ago. It is equally effective in velvet and georgette.

The Jenny collection this season includes many of the little Parisian toilettes for which this designer has always been noted. She retains the slim, straight line with very little fullness, showing short skirts fully 16 inches off the ground, sometimes slashed into panels, but more often straight.

The tailormades are severe and [illegible]. Sometimes the blouses worn with them have high collars and they are invariably accompanied by narrow cravats. The coat is frequently piped and has collar and narrow cuffs of lacquered kid, either gold or silver, or both de rose with a metallic finish. Some three-quarter coats are lined throughout with gold kid, giving a strikingly novel effect.

Lining Shows Down Front

A characteristic of the Jenny coats this season is a lining of chiffon or crepe de chine, either plain or printed, that shows down each front of the coat and turns back in wide revers, giving the effect of a separate undercoat rather on the lines of that introduced by Chanel last year. The revers fall on the lines of a jabot. Sometimes a coat dress is made on these lines—when fastened it looks like a coat and when open like a coat and dress. In reality it is just a dress, for the apparent coat lining is in one piece with what is apparently a dress and forms a straight line from selvage to selvage with each border of the lining.

Yokes are very prominent in this collection, always in a contrasting material and color to the dress itself. Sometimes the yoke has a V piece of the same material in front which at the back is continued into long the ends looped into a bow, the ends falling nearly to the waist and edged with a narrow binding of the material of which the dress is made.

Another variation of this type of dress has long sleeves in contrast to the dress. These sleeves are lengthened from the shoulder into scarf ends that cross behind to form a yoke, and twisted in front of the throat and have the ends hanging back over each shoulder. Navy blue and yellow are a favorite color combination for this type of gown. Navy and almond green, navy and rose, black and white and brown and beige are also quite frequently used.

Bead fringes are frequently used on tailored dresses, appearing in little tabs at the back of the yoke, at the wrists of the sleeves and also on the dress itself. There are many tunics, often irregular in line at the hem, some being longer at the back, others in front, while several have an apron front and leave off at the waist line in back.

Dance Frocks

On some of the loveliest dance frocks from Paris the flower is worn on the shoulder strap in the back instead of in the front.

National Sports Museum

A group of English sportsmen are taking steps to open a national sports museum in London. Exhibits would include busts and pictures of noted sportsmen, and bats, rackets and clubs used by famous sportsmen, amateur and professional. A large library would also be a part of the museum. The sum of $25,000 has been subscribed for buying exhibits and arranging them, when proper accommodation has been found.

A Purpose

Seven-year-old George, a resident of Lüneburg, went visiting recently with his grandfather. There were no children to play with and George soon grew restless.

Their host noticing this, held out a nickel saying: "Here sonny is a nickel. Go and get an ice-cream cone."

Looking skeptically at the nickel, George said: "What are you giving me that for—to get rid of me for a little while?"—Indianapolis News.

The dates for the annual Cotton Carnival at Roswell have been set for Oct. 8, 9 and 10. If the present plans are carried out the affair will be one of the biggest shows of the kind ever held in the Southwest.

The Sandburg Petroleum Company of California has secured a lease on a large acreage in the Artesia oil field and will start drilling at once. The land is in the center of the field, and several deep tests will go down during the summer.

J. B. Herndon and C. B. Bigelow, bankers of Albuquerque, and Walter C. Hammel, hardware salesman of Texas and formerly cashier of the Sierra County Bank at Hillsboro, were found not guilty of conspiracy against the government after a Santa Fe jury had been out thirty hours and taken ten ballots.

Club women of the New Mexico Federation of Women's Clubs will observe Better Homes Week, beginning on Mothers' Day, May 10, and extending to May 17. The object of the movement is to raise the standard of the American home and to bring wholesome living conditions within the reach of all.

United States forest officials are busy with plans for road construction within the Lincoln forest. [illegible] and T. F. Meyers of the district office of Albuquerque recently visited Alamogordo for the purpose of making a survey of the right of way for the logging railroad into the Sacramento river country in cooperation with the Southwest Lumber Company.

New Mexico, especially Roswell and the Pecos valley, will get a lot of advertising if the plans of the Roswell "Ad" club are carried out. The club is planning to send a special Pullman car of delegates to the International Associated Advertising Clubs' convention, which is to be held in Houston, Texas, May 10 and 11. This is to be one of the largest conventions of the kind ever held in America.

A forest fire in the Sacramento mountains, started presumably by some one dropping a match or cigarette, consumed 400 acres of [illegible] and young trees before it was put under control. The fire was in [illegible] canyon, [illegible] to the [illegible] ranch, on cut over lands of the Southwest Lumber Company. The principal loss will be in the destruction of the young growth. It is estimated that it will take fifty years to restore the area to its condition previous to the fire.

The annual Curry county track meet will be held in Clovis April [illegible].

The March Industrial Survey report issued by the U. S. Employment Service of the U. S. Department of Labor at Denver, Colo., states that an upward trend in seasonal activities in New Mexico is noted, particularly in agriculture, building, general and highway construction. The winter surplus of chiefly unskilled transient labor is decreasing, due to the opening up of spring activities and migration of large numbers of workers to other states. Steady operations at industrial plants, including the Bernalillo lumber mills, continue to afford ample employment for this class of help. The volume of building, municipal improvement and highway construction work is increasing and affording employment to many workers. Metal mine operations are steady with sufficient labor available. Lumbering is active and at Bernalillo an additional planing mill is under construction. While a temporary slight decrease in railway shop workers has recently been made, there has been an increase of working time to six days a week over the five-day week schedule the past several months.

Doctor Advised Operation Friend Said Try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound First

St. Paul, Minnesota.—"I was all rundown from overwork and worry, had no appetite, could not sleep at night, and looked like a corpse. I have six children (five boys and one girl) and did not get any strength after my last baby was born. I was getting worse and thinner every day. The doctor said I had to go to the Hospital but this I could not do on account of my family. So I went to a friend of mine and told her what the doctor had told me and she said, 'Now do as I tell you. Try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound as I have done. It helped me.' So I started taking the Vegetable Compound and I noticed after the first few bottles that I felt considerably better. After taking 9 or 10 bottles I got over my fainting spells. Everybody who sees me now notices the great improvement in my health. I am gaining in weight and strength and am feeling fine. Eat well and sleep good nights. Any woman can write to me and I will answer her letter."—MRS. MARY WILHELMY, 209 Duke Street, St. Paul, Minnesota.

ROAD BUILDING

NATION AND STATES WANT BETTER ROADS

The making of highways of interstate character and the uniform numbering of them is to be the work of a committee composed of officials from the federal bureau of public roads and the state highway departments. The committee will also prepare an appropriate plan and work to procure its adoption by the various states. The idea is to bring the states together in a closer community by means of good roads. It is believed that the plan, if successful, will add to the comfort of persons living in suburban as well as in urban areas and, by adding to the ease of transit, benefit everybody.

Commenting upon the plan Howard M. Gore, commissioner of agriculture said:

"The Association of State Highway Officials has been giving earnest consideration to this matter for several years and each state, as a unit, has been frantically passing ordinances, erecting signs, eliminating railroad crossings, and using the common methods to teach the public safety methods of highway transportation.

"There have been a number of safety council meetings and gatherings of various groups interested not only in highway safety, but in highway convenience, which have from time to time published their suggestions, but it has been found that there have been so many divergent views and conflicting ideas that the general public in traveling over the highways through the several states encounter considerable confusion because of the great variety of direction signs and danger signals."

Mr. Gore said that the move to co-ordinate the work of the various states through a government agency is just another proof that the federal government is doing a vital work which would not otherwise be accomplished if entire dependence were placed upon the states themselves. He also said:

"This joint board will not only adopt uniform signs and danger signals to be approved by the states, but will also number the main highways throughout the country. The purpose of this is to simplify traveling directions for the public so that a person traveling from New York through Chicago to San Francisco may be able to do so by following a certain number all the way. Then also every danger sign will mean the same in every state. It is believed that these measures will add much to the safety of the traveling public as well as to their comfort and personal comfort. You would be surprised if you knew the additional expense met by the public in the excessive mileage traveled because of misdirection or no direction at all.

"Thirty-eight state legislatures are now in session, and while a few states have no legislation on their statute books to provide for this coordinating work, a vast majority already have that authority, and it is expected that the remaining states will gladly fall in line.

"This board is being formed at the unanimous request of state highway departments that have been studying the question for several years, and I am only too glad to cooperate with them in bringing about this much-needed national coordination of the great traffic demands for uniform traffic regulations throughout the country."

Most Wonderful Highway Overlooks Los Angeles

Overlooking Los Angeles, Calif., is one of the world's most remarkable mountain roads, extending from Laurel canyon to the summit of Lookout mountain. While just wide enough for one vehicle, the road is perfectly safe for automobiles, as it is built to ascend by one route and descend by another, according to the Washington Star. The curves, hairpin turns, switchbacks, etc., are numerous, but all built so scientifically that there is no danger.

The road is carved from the side of a hill which is so precipitous that in one place there are six levels rising one above the other, all visible from the same point; in fact, the hill appears to be terraced with the zigzag of highway. The surface is of decomposed granite and the outside edge has been fenced with stout timbers.

From the summit—occupied by a summer hotel—one has a view that is without a rival on the Pacific coast. The ocean is but a few miles distant, with the Santa Catalina and San Clemente islands on the horizon, while along the shore are the score of towns and resorts built upon the sands. About thirty cities and towns are visible from the summit, with Los Angeles almost directly below.

Thousands Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It

Applicants for Insurance Often Rejected

Judging from reports from druggists who are constantly in direct touch with the public, there is one preparation that has been very successful in overcoming these conditions. The mild and healing influence of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its remarkable record of success.

An examining physician for one of the prominent Life Insurance Companies, in an interview of the subject, made the astonishing statement that one reason why so many applicants for insurance are rejected is because kidney trouble is so common to the American people, and the large majority of those whose applications are declined do not even suspect that they have the disease. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is on sale at all drug stores in bottles of two sizes, medium and large.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing be sure and mention this paper.

Grandpa Bourne died Wednesday, following an illness of two months, at the home of Rev. and Mrs. John H Skinner with whom he had made his home the past ten years. The funeral took place yesterday afternoon from the home, Rev Thompson, of Capitan, conducting the services. Interment was made in the local cemetery beside his wife who preceded him to the Great Beyond, seventeen years ago. A large concourse of relatives and friends followed the remains to their last resting place.

L. W Bourne was born January 13 1832, at Knob Fork, Grayson county, Virginia. Married Miss Julia Fulton March 12, 1867. Served throughout the Civil War, in the army of Northern Virginia, in Longstreet's Division, in which he held a captain's commission. Moved to Hopkins county, Texas, in 1869 and later made Runnels county his home for a period. Came to Lincoln county in 1901, and continuously resided here until his death.

Four children survive him: they are, Mrs. John H. Skinner, Carrizozo, Cleve G. and Robert H. Bourne, Duran, and Mrs. Chloe White, Ruidoso. He left 68 descendants, even to the fifth generation, all of whom live in New Mexico except four who are in California.

Grandpa Bourne was one of the most fascinating characters in Lincoln county, and at the date of his birth—nearly—with a little the century mark which claimed by death. He was a courtly gentleman of the old school; a man of honesty and sterling character.

"The voice is now silent,
the heart is now cold,
The smile and the welcome
that met us of old.
We miss him and mourn him
in sorrow sincere,
And dwell on the memory of days that have been."
