CHAPTER II.

Carrington folded the document and thoughtfully balanced it on his palm. What an ironical old world it was! There was a perpendicular wrinkle about his nose, and his lips had thinned into a mere line which drooped at the corners. The drone of a typewriter in the adjoining room sounded above the rattle-tattle of the street below. Through the open windows came a vague breath of summer redolent of flowers and grasses; for it was but eleven o'clock of the morning, and the smell of sun-baked brick and asphalt had not yet risen through the air. Far beyond the smoking, ragged sky-line Carrington could see the shifting, glittering river and the great ships going down to the sea. Presently the ashes from his dead cigar fell in a gray cascade down his coat and tumbled across his knees, but he gave no heed.

Ironical old world, indeed! Here, suddenly and unexpectedly, he found himself upon the battlefield of love and duty, where all honest men find themselves, sooner or later. To pit the heart against the conscience, [illegible]! Duty is an implacable goddess, and those who serve her most loyally are most ruthlessly driven. She buffets us into this corner and into that, digs pitfalls for the hesitant foot, and crushes the vacillating.

As all men will, Carrington set about to argue down his conscience; the heart is so insistent a counselor. Why should he give up the woman he loved, simply because duty demanded he should? After all, was not duty merely social obligation? What was it to him that the sheep were sheared? Was it right that he, of all men, should divide the house, throw the black pall of dishonesty over it, destroy his own happiness and hers, when so simple a thing as a match would crumble into nothingness this monument to one man's greed and selfishness? The survival of the fittest; if he put aside Self, who would thank him? Few, and many would call him a fool or a meddler. So many voices spoke that he seemed to hear none distinctly.

He alone had made these astonishing discoveries; he alone had followed the cunningly hidden trail of the serpent. He could stop where he was and none would be the wiser. To be sure, it was only a question of time when the scandal would become public through other channels; but in that event he would not be held responsible for bringing about the catastrophe. Besides, the ways of the serpent are devious and many, and other investigators might not come so close to the trail.

He had gone about his investigations without the least idea where they would lead him. At the beginning he had believed that the guilty ones were none higher than petty officials; but presently he found himself going over their heads, higher and higher, until, behold! he was at the lair of the old serpent himself. A client had carelessly dropped a bit of information, and it had taken seed with this surprising result. Henry Cavenaugh, millionaire promoter, financier, trust magnate, director in a hundred money-gathering concerns; Henry Cavenaugh, the father of the girl he loved and who loved him! Could it be he, indeed? It seemed incredible.

It was not a case of misappropriation of funds, such as a man may be guilty of when temporarily hard pressed. It was a bold and fraudulent passing of dividends that rightfully belonged to the investors; of wrongfully issuing statements of bolstered expenses, lack of markets, long strikes (promoted by Cavenaugh and his associates!), insufficient means of transportation. An annual dividend of seven per cent. of many millions that had been dishonestly passed over. The reports that there would be no dividends encouraged a slump in the listed price of the stock, and many had sold under pressure, thereby netting to Cavenaugh and others several millions. And the proof of all this lay in his hand!

It had been a keen hunt. Many and many a blind trail had he followed, only to come back to the start again. All that now remained for him to do was to pass this document on to the hands of the intrepid district attorney, and justice would be meted out to the guilty.

Her father! The picture of him rose suddenly and distinctly in his mind. Tall, powerfully built, a hooked nose, keen blue eyes, an aggressive chin, a repellent mouth, Henry Cavenaugh was the personification of the modern Croesus. Immutable in purpose, dogged in perseverance, a relentless enemy, a jesuit in that the end always justified the means, he stood a pillar in the world of finance, where there is sometimes justice, but never any mercy. Thirty-five years before he had been a messenger in a stock-broker's office. Of his antecedents nothing was known until he broke one of the famous gold corners in the seventies, when a handsome, ruddy-cheeked little Irishman bobbed up serenely from nowhere in particular and claimed to be the great Cavenaugh's father. But his proofs were not convincing, and when the son showed a decided contempt for him, he gently subsided into oblivion and was heard of no more. From time to time Carrington gathered a small crumb of information regarding his sweetheart's grandfather; but whenever he broached the subject, however tactfully, everybody concerned headed the conversation for a different port.

Carrington had never laid eyes on the old gentleman, and, for all he knew to the contrary, he might be a myth. He reasoned that in all probability the grandfather was illiterate, uncouth, and rather an awkward piece of family furniture to handle, when the family proper were ingratiating themselves into the Chippendales of society. Unfortunately, Mother Cavenaugh, good-hearted and amiable in her way, had been stung by the bee of the climbers, and her one ambition was to establish herself and daughters in society; and had not he, Carrington, come of an aristocratic family (poor, it is true), the doors of the Cavenaugh manor would never have opened to his knock. Even as it was, he was persona non grata to the millionaire, who was mad for a duke in the family. Besides Cavenaugh had his suspicions of any lawyer who grabbed outside the breastworks.

Some doves circled above a church-spire a few streets over the way, breaking the sunbeams against their polished wings. Finally they settled on the slate roof and fell to strutting and waddling and swelling their breasts pompously. Carrington opened and refolded the document, but he did not take his eyes from the doves. What should he do? What ill wind had blown this thing into his doorway? Nothing had warned him of the impending tangle. Until two days ago Cavenaugh was at the other end of the world, so far as his investigations at that time were concerned.

He struck a match. The sliver of pine flared palely in the sunshine, writhed and dropped, black and charred, to the floor. He shrugged his shoulders. Chivalry of this sort was not the order of the day. There was something stronger than the voice of duty, something stronger than the voice of the heart; it was the voice of pity, which urged its appeal for the hundreds of men and women who had invested their all in the Cavenaugh concerns. The thought of their ultimate ruin, should Cavenaugh be permitted to pursue his course unchecked, bore heavily upon him. No, he could not do it. He must fight, even if he lost his all in the battle. It's a fine thing to right a wrong. All the great victories in the world have been won for others than the victors. That Cavenaugh was the father of the girl he loved must have no weight on the scales of justice.

Resolutely he thrust the document into his coat pocket, closed his desk and relighted his cigar. In that moment he had mapped out his plan of action. That very night he would lay the whole thing [illegible] clearly before the girl herself, and whatever decision she made, he would stand or fall by it, for he knew her to be the soul of honor.

Poor girl! It was a heart-breaking business. How in the world should he begin, and where should he stop? Ah, that was it! He would lay the matter before her in a manner that would conceal the vital nearness of the case, as if it were some client of his who was unknown to her. And when she judged the case, he would speak the bald truth. It would be a cruel blow, but nevertheless he must deal it. She loved her father, and after his own peculiar fashion her father loved her. She was the only one in the family who could wheedle him out of a purpose; to the rest of the family his word was law immutable. It was very hard, sighed Carrington. For the father he had neither pity nor sympathy; there were many ugly tales about his financial dealings; but his whole heart went out unreservedly to the girl.

When Carrington had gone to Cavenaugh, his heart in his throat, to speak to him relative to his daughter's hand, he unwittingly knocked off the top of a volcano.

"Marry my daughter!" Cavenaugh roared, emphasizing his wrath and disapproval with a bang of fist upon palm. "My daughter shall marry only among her equals, not among her inferiors. A king is not good enough for my Kate." There was another bang of the fist, decided and final. "A lawyer? Not if I know myself. I wouldn't trust a lawyer out of sight," bluntly. "Kate shall marry a duke or a prince, if I can find one suitable."

Carrington would have smiled had the moment been less serious.

"No man can possibly appreciate her worth more readily than I, sir," he replied, "or love her more dearly."

"Love!" with a snort. "Twaddle out of story-books!"

"But you yourself love her."

"I'm her father," Cavenaugh returned complacently, adding a gesture which had the effect of describing the fact that it was perfectly logical for a father to love his daughter, but that it wasn't logical at all for any other male biped to love her.

"I am sorry," said the disheartened suitor, rising. "I suppose that after this unpleasant interview—"

"Oh, you're a decent sort," interrupted Cavenaugh generously; "and if you are of a mind to behave yourself hereafter, you will always find a chair at my table. But my daughter is not for you, sir, emphatically not. That is all, sir;" and Cavenaugh picked up his evening paper.

There was music in the air in the vicinity of the Outlook office last evening, but the noise was the tin pan variety. Some newly weds were chivarried but the orgies were not prolonged because the groom promptly "treated" and the boys as promtly repaired to the nearest soda fountain. We failed to learn the names of the happy couple.

CARRIZOZO, N.M., JUNE 10, 1909

The Truest Public Spirit

The recognition of the responsibility which executive off ce in any branch of government carries with it has brought about reforms in various parts of the country, and it promises great things for the future. What is really the truest public spirit has been embodied in the following creed:

"I will never vote again for any candidate for state office who does not have some well worked out program for conserving and developing our rural communities, for constructing good roads throughout the State for placing a good schoolhouse and good school in easy reach of every child, for placing in every one of such schools well-trained and amply-paid teachers, and for making our institutions of charity higher than any. I am tired of hearing men talk and of voting for men merely because they support a certain man for President and for reward for party service."—Delineator.

You and we might add that no candidate for a state or federal office should receive one vote who is not pledged to some well defined plan for the reclamation and distribution of the arid lands of the west. Why dont the government expend some of its vast wealth in irrigation projects instead of building more ships just to keep alive the envy and hatred of other nations.

Ten acres of irrigated land in the now arid southwest would provide a good living for any family. Then why is the land allotted in tracts of fifty and three hundred and twenty and more acres where farming is impossible and starvation is staring every settler in the face unless he has money enough to keep himself and family from actual want.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox says no man becomes serious until after the age of thirty-five. Possibly Ella has never seen a married man who was presented with twins before the age of twenty five.

It takes a child a couple of years to learn to talk and then it takes the rest of a lifetime to keep from talking too much.

Have your printing done at home even though you must pay a little more for it. Every dollar you pay to the home printer will return to you a hundred fold.

The man who is respected and prosperous in his community is the man that is loyal to his home paper.

Wilber Wright says there is no danger in aerial navigation. None whatever. It's hitting the ground that hurts.

The America Hen

Denton, Texas, June 8th—Thrashing has begun in many parts of Texas today. A dollar and forty cents is the price offered for number two wheat.

Primary, as the great crops are among the things that make for farm prosperity and business recovery they aue ably supplemented by such subsidiary source of farm revenue as come from dairying and poultry raising. In 1899 the farm value of eggs produced in this country was $144,285,158. That was when prices were comparatively low. During the current year the price has ranged from 16 to 40 cents a dozen at St Louis, or fully twice that of eight years ago. It is therefore easily within the facts to say that the American hen now adds to the income of the farm in eggs alone no less than $280,0000,000 a year. Few people appreciate how much these minor sources of farm income help to turn the tide from depression to prosperity. There are, at a rough estimate, 2,000,000,000 laying hens in the United States responsible for the production of at least 1,000,000,000 dozens of eggs in the course of a year. When hard times run up against such facts as these there is going to be a change for the better. And this is why, from the cash income derived from these sales the current farm purchases are made for the individual or household needs, in the daily or weekly visits to the country or weekly stores. High prices for this and other produce help to increase the output. Month by month the command of the farm over the products of industry gives proof of a demand which merchant and manufacturer is quick to recognize as the advent of better times. The turning point between bad times and better times is to no insignificent extent the work of the patriotic American hen. Hats off to her. The Wall Street Journal.

"I suppose he is, mamma."

"Do you know anything about him? What is he worth, for instance?"

"Well, he's worth any dozen of the ordinary young men of my acquaintance."

"Yes, but—"

"And he's worth $100 a week to the firm he works for—even if he does get only $25 now."

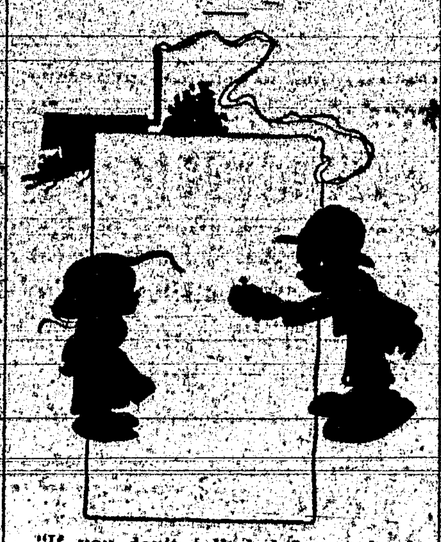
JUST SAVED AWFUL BLUNDER

Careless Act of Office Boy Nearly Brought Disaster to London Newspaper.

The well-known novelist, Mr. William Le Queux, can tell a story as excellently as he can write one. One of his anecdotes is of the way the London Globe nearly published an erroneous report of the death of Queen Victoria. A sub-editor of that paper, he came in from luncheon one day, and found on the Exchange Telegraph Company's "tape" the words: "Her majesty died at 11 a. m. to-day." Instantly the whole establishment was thrown into that state of lightning-like, yet methodical, energy incidental to such emergencies. The paper was put into mourning, the news bills got into readiness, the big types set—the tidings were on the point of being shed into the world; only—why was there no confirmation? At the last possible moment of preventing so terrible a blunder it was found that a careless office boy had torn from the tape the first four words of the message. In its entirety it ran: "John Frayling, coachman to her majesty, died at 11 a. m. to-day."—Pearson's Weekly.

SHE WAS WISE.



"If you don't tell dad I wus in de orchard youse kin have dis apple."

"Aw, gowang! You think I'm as green as dat apple? You want me to eat it and get the colic, an' den paw'll think I wus de one dat wus in de orchard!"

AMONG THE ANCIENTS.

The Romans had just received Paul's epistle.

"Why, he scolds us as if he were a president of the United States and we were nothing but a congress!" they said.

Consequently they paid no attention to his recommendations.
